U.S. Futures Drop as China Chip Optimism Fades and Oil Surges

U.S. stock futures are sharply lower Friday morning as investors pull back from record highs following fading optimism around Nvidia's China chip sales, rising Treasury yields, and renewed concerns over the Iran conflict.

- Dow futures: -0.6%
- S&P 500 futures: -1.1%
- Nasdaq futures: -1.5%

The selloff comes after another strong session Thursday where major indexes pushed to fresh highs, driven largely by AI-related momentum.

AI trade hit by China chip uncertainty

Markets are reversing lower after reports suggested recent U.S.-China talks did not meaningfully address semiconductor export restrictions.

This dampened hopes that Nvidia would quickly unlock major AI chip sales into China.

- Nvidia: lower premarket after hitting record highs Thursday

Although reports earlier this week suggested the U.S. approved limited H200 chip sales to several Chinese firms, no actual deliveries have occurred yet.

👉 Key issue:

- AI enthusiasm still strong
 - But expectations may have gotten ahead of reality

Profit-taking hits tech after massive rally

The Nasdaq is leading the downside as investors take profits in chip and AI names after an aggressive run higher.

Analysts are increasingly warning that much of the bullish AI narrative may already be priced into current valuations.

👉 Market mood shifting from:

- “buy everything AI”
to
 - “show me real follow-through”

Trump ramps up pressure on Iran again

Geopolitical tensions also escalated after President Donald Trump issued fresh warnings toward Iran.

Trump suggested he was running out of patience and threatened more severe military action if Tehran does not move toward a deal.

At the same time, hopes for a quick resolution appear to be fading again despite recent diplomacy efforts involving China.

Oil spikes higher again

Oil prices surged following Trump's comments:

- Brent crude sharply higher
- Energy markets reacting to renewed escalation fears

The continued disruption around the Strait of Hormuz remains one of the market's biggest macro risks.

👉 Ongoing concern:

- Higher oil = more inflation pressure
 - Inflation = more hawkish Fed risk

 Treasury yields surge on inflation fears

Markets are also reacting to a major move higher in Treasury yields:

- 10-year yield jumped near a one-year high

This follows a series of hotter inflation reports this week tied partly to rising energy costs.

👉 Rising yields = pressure on:

- Growth stocks
 - Tech valuations
 - Risk appetite overall

 Trump-Xi talks conclude

President Trump and Chinese President Xi Jinping concluded another round of talks in Beijing.

While both sides described discussions positively, concrete details remain limited.

Topics reportedly included:

- Trade
- Taiwan
- Iran conflict
- U.S. exports to China

Trump also claimed China agreed to purchase:

- U.S. oil
- Boeing aircraft
- Agricultural goods

though specifics remain unclear.

⚠ Breakdown: what's driving the market now?

- AI profit-taking
- Rising Treasury yields
- Iran tensions escalating again
- Oil prices surging

👉 Market = risk-off pullback after record highs

👁 What traders are watching today
