- 30- Year Bond Auction Previous (4.773%) (1:00PM)
- JPMorgan Chase ($JPM) ↑0.2%: Reported a Q4 profit drop due to a one-time charge tied to the end of its Apple credit-card partnership. Excluding the charge, profit rose to $14.7B, driven by strong trading revenue.
- Bank of New York Mellon ($BK) ↓1.7%: Posted higher Q4 profit and raised a key return metric. Shares slipped despite higher interest income and a boost in client asset values from rising equity markets.
- Delta Air Lines ($DAL) ↓5%: Beat Q4 EPS expectations, but revenue missed, and 2026 guidance disappointed investors.
- L3Harris Technologies ($LHX) ↑12%: Jumped after the U.S. government announced a $1B investment into the company's rocket motor division.
- Intel (INTC) ↑3.6% Advanced Micro Devices ($AMD) ↑2.6%: Both upgraded by KeyBanc to Overweight. Analysts cited stronger-than-expected data-center demand and tightening memory supply.
- Traveer Therapeutics ($TVTX) ↓28%: Fell sharply after receiving an FDA request for more data demonstrating clinical benefit for its rare kidney-disease treatment.

- Synopsys ($SNPS) ↓2.3%: Downgraded by Piper Sandler to Neutral from Overweight due to concerns about prolonged growth headwinds.

U.S. Futures Slip as Traders Brace for CPI & Bank Earnings

U.S. stock futures edged lower early Tuesday, with investors turning cautious ahead of a pivotal inflation print and the official kickoff to earnings season. By 03:05 ET, Dow futures were down slightly, while the S&P 500 and Nasdaq drifted into negative territory as traders positioned for a busy macro week.

Stocks finished higher on Monday despite early pressure tied to political turbulence surrounding the Federal Reserve. Markets ultimately found support across tech, consumer staples, and materials, helping the major averages rebound into the close.

“The narrative is largely unchanged — bulls remain in control thanks to improving growth, healthy earnings, productivity gains and stimulus anticipation,” Vital Knowledge said.

Fed Independence in the Spotlight

The White House faced bipartisan pushback after a criminal probe into Fed Chair Jerome Powell triggered fresh concerns over central bank independence.

Reports indicated the investigation was initiated by U.S. Attorney Jeanine Pirro — a Trump ally — without top Justice Department officials being briefed. Pirro argued the inquiry stemmed from cost overruns at the Fed’s D.C. headquarters renovation.

Former Fed Chairs Yellen, Bernanke, and Greenspan issued an unusually sharp joint rebuke, warning the move resembled the policymaking of “emerging markets with weak institutions.”

Republicans also chimed in, with Senator Thom Tillis calling the probe a “huge mistake.”

The controversy briefly lifted Treasury yields and added a layer of political risk heading into the Fed’s January meeting.

CPI Takes Center Stage

With political noise swirling, traders are now squarely focused on December’s consumer price index, due Wednesday.

Forecasts call for:

- Headline CPI: +2.7% YoY (unchanged)
- MoM CPI: +0.3%
- Core CPI: expected to tick up to 2.7% YoY, +0.3% MoM

ING expects a hotter-than-expected core print, citing distorted November data linked to delayed price collection during the long government shutdown.

A sticky inflation read could complicate the Fed’s decision-making after officials spent late 2025 emphasizing labor-market weakness when cutting rates multiple times.

Markets still expect no change this month, with the Fed holding rates at 3.50%–3.75%.

Mega-Bank Earnings Kick Off

The first major catalyst of earnings season arrives today with JPMorgan set to report. A wave of big-bank results follows:

- Wednesday: Bank of America, Citigroup, Wells Fargo
- Thursday: Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley

Investors will be watching for signals on:

- loan growth
- trading and investment banking trends
- credit quality
- guidance amid uncertain rate paths

Strong results could help calm nerves after a volatile start to 2026 dominated by geopolitical risks — including the U.S. military action in Venezuela and broad threats of intervention in other regions.

Oil Extends Rally as Iran Protests Escalate

Oil prices advanced for a fourth straight session, driven by intensifying unrest in Iran — a key OPEC producer.

- Brent: +0.5% to $64.16
- WTI: +0.8% to $59.82

Both benchmarks notched multi-week highs Monday. Traders are increasingly pricing in supply risk as anti-government demonstrations expand and pressure Iran's energy infrastructure.
