U.S. Futures Slip After Hotter-Than-Expected Inflation Report

U.S. stock futures are moving lower Tuesday morning after inflation data came in slightly hotter than expected, while ongoing tensions between the U.S. and Iran continue to pressure oil prices higher.

- Dow futures: slightly lower
- S&P 500 futures: -0.3%
- Nasdaq futures: -0.8%

The weakness is being led by tech as rising inflation and elevated oil prices fuel concerns around interest rates and broader market valuations.

 CPI comes in hotter than expected

Fresh inflation data showed prices continuing to rise at a firm pace in April:

- Headline CPI:
 - +0.6% MoM
 - +3.8% YoY
- Core CPI:
 - +0.4% MoM
 - +2.8% YoY

Both readings came in above expectations, reinforcing concerns that higher energy prices may be bleeding into broader areas of the economy.

👉 Market concern:

- Inflation staying sticky
- Fed potentially staying hawkish longer

 Iran negotiations deteriorate further

Geopolitical tensions also remain a major overhang after President Donald Trump sharply rejected Iran's latest peace counteroffer.

Trump described the proposal as "unacceptable" and suggested the ceasefire was now on "massive life support."

Reports also indicate the administration may be considering renewed military action if negotiations continue to stall.

👉 Key issue:

- Diplomacy losing momentum
 - Conflict risk rising again

🛢️ Oil jumps back above $100

Oil prices are climbing sharply again as the Strait of Hormuz remains heavily disrupted:

- Brent crude: +3.1% (~$107)
- WTI crude: +3.3% (~$101)

With tanker traffic still restricted, fears around an energy-driven inflation spike are increasing again.

👉 This continues to pressure:

- Inflation expectations
 - Growth outlook
 - Market sentiment

🤖 AI momentum still supporting the broader market

Despite macro pressure, AI-related optimism remains a key source of support for equities.

Chip stocks have continued outperforming as investors stay focused on strong earnings growth and aggressive AI infrastructure spending.

👉 Current market setup:

- AI enthusiasm = bullish support
 - Inflation + geopolitics = downside pressure

⚠️ Breakdown: what's driving the market now?

- AI trade still holding up
