Markets Pause as AI Rally Faces Another Test

Tech is under pressure again to close out the week.

- Dow Futures: +0.1%
- S&P 500 Futures: -0.3%
- Nasdaq 100 Futures: -0.9%

The Nasdaq remains the weakest index as investors continue reducing exposure to high-growth AI names.

AI Trade Loses More Steam

The biggest headline overnight:

Reports say OpenAI may delay its IPO until 2027, pushing back what many expected to be one of the biggest public offerings in history.

That news weighed on AI sentiment globally:

- SoftBank: -13%
- Samsung: -4%
- SK Hynix: -6%

Investors are starting to question whether AI valuations have gotten ahead of fundamentals after months of explosive gains.

Chipmakers Still Holding Up Better

Despite the broader tech weakness, semiconductor stocks remain one of the strongest parts of the AI trade.

Yesterday's standout:

- Micron (MU): +16% after strong earnings and AI demand guidance.

The market is beginning to separate the winners from the rest:

- ✓ Chipmakers continue benefiting from AI infrastructure spending.
 - ⚠️ Consumer electronics and software companies are feeling the higher costs.

Inflation & Rates Still Matter

Yesterday's PCE inflation report came in largely as expected, but it wasn't enough to calm interest rate concerns.

Markets continue to price in the possibility of another Fed rate hike later this year, keeping pressure on expensive growth stocks.

Higher rates remain one of the biggest headwinds for the technology sector.

 Middle East Update

Reports of another attack on a cargo ship near the Strait of Hormuz reminded investors that geopolitical risks haven't disappeared.

Oil prices moved slightly higher overnight but remain well below the highs reached during the conflict, helping keep broader market fears in check.
