- FOMC Member Bostic Speaks (9:00AM)
- Fed Collins Speaks (9:30AM)
- Home Depot ($HD) rose 2.1% after the home improvement giant topped Wall Street revenue estimates for its fiscal first quarter. While earnings came in slightly below expectations, the company reaffirmed its full-year guidance, boosting investor confidence in a still-resilient home improvement market.
- Apple ($AAPL) dipped 0.3% following data showing Chinese shipments of its iPhone and other mobile devices fell in April to their lowest level since 2011. The decline raised concerns about growing trade headwinds and softening demand in a key market.
- Intel ($INTC) slipped 0.2% after reports from Reuters indicated the chipmaker is considering divesting its network and edge computing units. The move comes as new CEO Lip-Bu Tan looks to streamline operations and focus on core semiconductor strategies.
- Bilibili ($BILI) surged 4.4% after the Chinese video-sharing platform reported quarterly earnings and revenue that beat analyst expectations, driven by strong user engagement and improved cost controls.
- Equinor ($EQNR) climbed 2.8% after the Norwegian energy firm announced that the U.S. had lifted a work stoppage order on its major offshore wind project off the coast of New York, clearing a path for continued development.

- Microsoft ($MSFT) edged down 0.1% despite a price target hike from Goldman Sachs, which pointed to the company's AI investments as a long-term growth catalyst. Investors appeared to take profits following the stock's recent strength.
 - Boeing ($BA) rose 0.1% after Bernstein raised its price target, citing the company's historical ability to recover momentum in its commercial aircraft division.
 - UBS ($UBS) dropped 3.4% after Bloomberg reported that the Swiss bank is expected to lose the initial phase of its legal battle against a proposed Swiss law. The legislation could force UBS to hold as much as $25 billion in additional capital, raising investor concerns over profitability and regulatory risk.

U.S. Futures Dip as Retail Earnings, Tariffs, and Tax Bill Take Center Stage

U.S. stock index futures edged lower early Tuesday, pulling back slightly after a multi-day rally, as investors awaited earnings from key retail names and monitored developments around U.S. fiscal and trade policy.

At 05:50 ET, Dow Jones Futures slipped 90 points (-0.2%), S&P 500 Futures dropped 21 points (-0.4%), and Nasdaq 100 Futures fell 100 points (-0.5%).

The S&P 500 notched its sixth consecutive gain on Monday, recovering from early losses sparked by Moody's recent downgrade of the U.S. credit rating. The index now sits just 3% below its all-time high.

Home Depot (HD) Earnings in Focus as Retail Sector Reports Begin

Investors are turning their attention to earnings from the retail sector, with Home Depot ($HD) set to report results before the bell. Market participants will be listening closely to any commentary on pricing strategy, especially following Walmart's ($WMT) recent warning that it may need to raise prices due to mounting tariff costs.

Trump, in response, urged Walmart to absorb the impact of his tariffs. Analysts will be watching whether Home Depot or Lowe's (NYSE:LOW) issue similar warnings and how home improvement demand is holding up under economic pressure.

Toll Brothers ($TOL) is also scheduled to report after the close, offering insights into the health of the housing and construction sectors.

Tax Cuts and Fiscal Concerns Take the Spotlight

A key House committee approved Trump-backed tax reform legislation over the weekend, paving the way for a vote this week. The bill includes broad income tax cuts and increases in defense and immigration spending.

While Republican leadership supports the measure, opposition is growing among moderates who warn it could balloon the already record-high U.S. fiscal deficit.

Trade Developments Continue to Simmer

Investors remain focused on global trade tensions following last week's U.S.-China tariff pause. U.S.-Japan trade talks are scheduled later this week, though the U.S. Treasury has indicated no major announcements are expected at the upcoming G7 meeting in Canada.

Meanwhile, China's Ministry of Commerce criticized the U.S. over its renewed export warnings related to Huawei's Ascend chips, claiming it undermines progress made during recent high-level talks in Geneva.

Oil Prices Dip Slightly on Iran, Ukraine Headlines

Crude prices drifted lower Tuesday as investors digested geopolitical headlines. Brent crude edged down 0.1% to $65.49, while WTI crude also slipped 0.1% to $62.11 per barrel.

Iran reaffirmed that its uranium enrichment is "non-negotiable," complicating nuclear deal efforts that could otherwise lift sanctions and boost Iranian oil exports. Separately, any signs of progress toward a Russia-Ukraine ceasefire are being watched closely for potential impacts on energy markets.

Bitcoin Gains as Senate Advances Stablecoin Bill; Altcoins Rally

Bitcoin (BTC) edged higher early Tuesday as U.S. lawmakers made progress on long-awaited cryptocurrency legislation, signaling increased institutional support and sparking broad gains across the crypto market.

As of 02:04 ET, Bitcoin rose 0.8% to $106,180.90, holding near the four-month high it hit over the weekend. On Sunday, the token briefly surged above $107,000, gaining more than $2,500 in under an hour—likely fueled by thin liquidity and algorithmic buying at key support levels.

GENIUS Act Moves Forward in Senate

The U.S. Senate voted 66-32 on Monday night to advance the GENIUS Act, a stablecoin regulation bill that sets the groundwork for a federal framework governing digital dollar-backed tokens.

Previously stalled due to opposition from some Democrats, the bill gained momentum after key concerns were resolved. A Senate floor vote is expected later this week, after which the legislation would move to President Trump's desk for final approval.

The bill's progress is viewed as a milestone for the crypto sector, which has long sought regulatory clarity to enable broader adoption and institutional involvement.

Crypto Optimism Grows with Regulatory Tailwinds and Tax Cut Vote Ahead

Bitcoin's 11% gain so far this month has been supported by both regulatory optimism and macroeconomic tailwinds, including hopes for easing global trade tensions.

Market participants are now turning attention to today's expected vote in the House of Representatives on Trump's proposed tax cut bill. While the measure has support from Republican leadership, critics warn it may deepen the nation's fiscal deficit, already under scrutiny after Moody's downgraded the U.S. credit rating due to its $36 trillion debt burden.

Altcoins Rally with Ethereum Leading the Charge

Broader crypto markets followed Bitcoin higher, with major altcoins posting solid gains:

- Ethereum (ETH) jumped 7.9% to $2,562.73
- XRP (XRP) rose 2.1% to $2.3795
- Solana (SOL) gained 4%
- Cardano (ADA) climbed 4.5%
- Polygon (MATIC) advanced 3%

Meme tokens also rallied:

- Dogecoin (DOGE) jumped 5%
- $TRUMP token added 3.4%

Analysts suggest continued momentum in crypto could lead to fresh all-time highs for Bitcoin by year-end, especially if regulatory clarity and institutional inflows continue.
