- Lowe's ($LOW) rose 1.6% after the home improvement chain posted first-quarter net sales that were roughly in line with estimates. The company acknowledged "near-term uncertainty" in its outlook, but markets appeared to take the results in stride.
- Target ($TGT) dropped 4.2% as the retailer cut its annual sales forecast, following a sharp drop in quarterly same-store sales. Management blamed weaker consumer confidence and reduced discretionary spending.
- Nvidia ($NVDA) slipped 0.9% after CEO Jensen Huang said that U.S. export controls on AI chips had failed to slow China's progress, and instead were accelerating development of local alternatives.
- Palo Alto Networks ($PANW) fell 3.4% after the cybersecurity firm reported a 12% rise in Q3 operating expenses, while revenue came in roughly in line with Wall Street expectations.
- Wolfspeed ($WOLF) plunged 60% amid reports that the semiconductor company is preparing to file for bankruptcy within weeks, triggering a broad selloff in the name.
- Xpeng ($XPEV) surged 5.3% after the EV maker posted a narrower-than-expected Q1 loss, along with strong revenue and vehicle delivery numbers that beat analyst forecasts.
- Baidu ($BIDU) climbed 2.1% after the Chinese search giant reported better-than-expected Q1 revenue, citing momentum in its AI cloud division.

- UnitedHealth ($UNH) dropped 7% after HSBC downgraded the stock to 'reduce' from 'hold', citing earnings growth concerns despite a recent leadership shake-up.
 - Medtronic ($MDT) inched up 0.2% after reports from the Wall Street Journal said the company plans to spin off its diabetes unit into a standalone entity.
 - Take-Two Interactive ($TTWO) declined 4.4% after the company unveiled a $1 billion common stock offering, planning to use the proceeds for general corporate purposes.
 - VF Corporation ($VFC) plunged 11% after a weak outlook overshadowed what were otherwise positive quarterly results. The company owns brands like The North Face and Vans.

Market Sentiment Remains Cautious

- Tuesday ended a six-session winning streak for the S&P 500, as rising 10-year Treasury yields (peaking at 4.48%) spooked investors.
 - Moody's downgrade of the U.S. credit rating last week still hangs over markets.
 - Investors are watching today's House vote on President Trump's tax bill, which faces internal GOP opposition. The bill could add $3T to $5T to the national debt, already at $36.2T.

Trade and Fed Uncertainty

- U.S.-China tensions are back in focus, as China warned that chip export controls threaten a recent trade truce.
 - U.S.-Japan trade talks are set to resume this week.
 - Federal Reserve officials signaled more caution ahead, citing economic uncertainty and inflation risks from tariffs, reducing the odds of near-term rate cuts.

Earnings on Deck

- Big names set to report today:
 - Before the bell: Lowe's ($LOW), Target ($TGT), Canada Goose ($GOOS), TJX Companies ($TJX)
 - After the close: Snowflake ($SNOW)
 - The retail sector is under pressure from weaker consumer confidence and tariff-related headwinds.
 - Walmart ($WMT) last week warned of price hikes, while
 - Home Depot ($HD) said some products may become unavailable.
